Lets look again at the latter part of Castis quote on experimental models: . . . the model then serves to answer by direct experiment certain types of questions, such as how air flows over an airplane wing under different atmospheric conditions or how a particular types of clothes. . . look when draped over a perfect shape. (Casti, 1997, p. 13) This is precisely what any good model should do: help us to answer (and pose) questions certainly not a new revelation ! Thus, as I argued in the beginning, all good models are experimental models. A good experimental environmental model is one that is pragmatically objective and is outfitted with suitably numerous and appropriate knobs and levers. What I mean by knobs and levers can be anything from variables in an equation that represent some aspect of the particular environmental system (e. g. , earthquake magnitude) to literal buttons or sliders of a graphical user interface. These knobs and levers must be relevant to the needs (and ability) of the human actors in a decision-making context so as promote their twisting and pulling that is, encourage experimentation. We can see then, because experimentation is a quality of a good model, as well as, being an important part of evaluating model goodness, development of new and better experimental environmental-models will likely lead to their use and (provisional) adoption. I think that if we can make environmental models more engaging by improving...
