Excerpt: . . . that he is not one of the owners, or that he signs as agent for the owners, the legal presumption is that he is an owner, and then the note is of course his note. It might under some circumstances be the note of the other owners, and they too might be liable upon it, but at all events it his his note, and he can be sued upon it, and if he ought not to have been sued alone, that is a matter for him to plead. He has signed a note which contains a promise to pay, and it must of course be taken to be his promise to pay, unless he shows aflirmatively that it is not his promise; and as that fact neither appears in the note, because it does not show that he was not an owner; nor was...
