A point of interest in this connection is the interfertility of -)es, such as are derived from the crossings of these species. In the extracted types coming from the crossing of signaticollis and diversa, the degree of fertility is as high or higher than in either of the parent species. Comparison of the data shows clearly that there is relatively higher fertility in the F2 extractives, showing that there has been a change in the nature of the gametes by the reaction of crossing, and inhibition of uniform fertilization and development is removed by passage through the Fx reactions. A point of interest arises in this connection, namely, the increased interfertility between these extracted F2 stocks and the parent strains. The reactions in these crosses are of monohybrid or trihybrid types, and the extracted products show no change in any detectable attributes or qualities, so that the reason why the extracted products of crossing have higher interfertility is a problem for further study. There clearly is some change in the gametes as a result of the passage through the Ft reactions which in some way removes the barriers to complete fertility in the matings of these otherwise distinct types. I was further interested to see what the data...
