Not illustrated. 1895 Excerpt: .Some of the nets were never occupied, and remained unvisited the greater part of the day. These I believed belonged to the housekeepers in the dark attic, who only came out when hungry. There seemed to be some code among them against plundering each other s nets. But there was one big fellow who lived altogether by appropriating the game from the nets of other spiders. Their favorite resort was a window near where I wrote, which from some fault of construction cannot be raised easily, and is seldom disturbed. Sundry broken corners of the panes gave the spiders free egress and ingress. During a protracted drought of the summer they literally covered the window with their nets, outside and in. But a larger corner was broken from a lower pane, and the aperture was used as a door by the wasps which built in the attic above, to the great disturbance of the spiders. The wasps can never remember from one journey to another through what opening of the window they are accustomed to pass. By their constant hoverings to find their way out and in, they kept the spiders A Spider s Front Leg and daw Magnified. m00(1 dangerOUS tO the spiders as well as myself. When you establish yourself near the highway of building mud-wasps, it is best to maintain strict neutrality. If you interfere with their labors you are likely to receive a retaliatory sting. Let them alone and they will let...
