At the close of the sermon it was announced that Signor Cabrera, of Seville, who was passing through Madrid, would hold a supplemental service. To this at least four hundred persons remained. In the afternoon I looked in at several Sunday schools, and in the evening attended service at the Lavapiese. There were from three to four hundred persons present, many of whom had Bibles, and I was exceedingly struck by the readiness and ease with which they turned to the passages of Scripture read or referred to by the preacher. It must not be supposed that these were all the meetings for Protestant worship held in the city at this time. I have merely named those at which I myself was present, and I have reported the impression which they...
